principles, as well as principles to the success of men. There are two classes of men relative to politics—those who seek to inject their own penciples toto the minds of others, and thus prevail upon the strength of their lifes. These are reformers if wise—fencies if unwise. The other class are those who imbibe their principles from practical contact with their fellow men, from observation of their interests, from aympathy with their views and commandon with their fellows. Being absorbed railing that officient interests, from aympathy with their views and commandon with their fellows. Being absorbed railing their largers, they reflect the average mind eather than direct it. They represent railing their inspiration from within, from some "inner light," conscience, theory, or assumed inspiration, tend towards cryothets, egotistic assumptions of personal superiority, and impracticable not plan schemes which disturb and agitate society. They need to be toned down into practical wishous and statesmanship by a more intimate official experience of the practical wishous and statesmanship by a more intimate official experience of the practical wishous and statesmanship by a more intimate official experience of the practical wishous conducting their schemes, and a more sympathetic familiarity with the men for whose welfare they assume to ant. The latter class on the other hand tends to the error of accommodating their consciences to surrounding cells so as to fall into harmonious support of them. They thus become agreets in perpetualing and extending cells which they ought to recognize as Each and the addiction of a sak what their supporters would like to have, and to obtain it for them.

esption of duty in to ask what their supporters would like to have, and to obtain it for them.

It is exact to see in this political division of maskino, that in our country the former Federal and subsequent While and present Republican party lean to the former class, and the former Republican party in its last days and the late Democratic party, to the latter. There have been personal exceptions in all parties to the tendency of the party tward them two extremess. Thus in the former that is not a subsequent of the party tward them two extremess. Thus in the former While party Henry Clay and to a large dayre Wm. H. Seward, absorbed the popular ideas and will as well as endescreed to impets their own on the people; while on the other hand deflerson, Jackson, and Benton, were stern isomeclastic adherents to their personal convictions compelling all to how helore them or to break under their power. Personal convictions compelling all to how helore them or to break under their power. Personal convictions compelling all to how helore them or to break under their power. Personal to their own party with some of the virtues of the party opposing them that made them great. In our late President we have a noble manifestation of that same ability at ones to represent the people, and to inaugurate a greatreform, to be graded by the popular will and to control a revolutionary movement, to absorb the whole wisdom to the majority and of the majority, and having thus drank in the insulation of the nation's history.

The point we wish to impress, drawn from these facts, in the : The Republican porty, being funded on vital principles, is in mediance of failure from the lock of that element of success. Its dasger will lie in its tendency to regard the principles, its in mediance of failure from the lock of the madellanding of the madellanding file files in madellanding of the matellanding of the madellanding files th

They acted in the matter upon their own responsibility. CLIMATE AND LOCALIFT.

Much his been said by writers from this city that noistes to elimate and locality; which are in many instandes represented as unexceptionable. That 8 an Francisco can justify because of services actifictes, unexcelled by any other poot in the world, no one will dispute who has beheld her beautiful bay and the Golden Gate, through which the largest hips find an easy entrance thereto; but the land site of the city is greatly different, as it consists of a broken and unsight, locality. Many of the principal streets are abruptly checked by high bluffs of sand und rock. The evaluation of sale and the containty drifting, and when the weather is very windy one cannot walk on the streets without muffling the eyes. Whilst the climate here has some throrable points, it at the same time has some wery uninvorsible ones.
